My eyes move to the stars and my laughter dies. All those millions of stars, each one a tiny beacon of brightness against the oppressive night. A wave of hope fills me. How do you fight the darkness? You refuse to let it snuff out your light. I let the wind carry me away, knowing it'll eventually deposit me where I need to go.

"And mountains may rise and fall, and the sun might wither away, and the sea claim the land and swallow the sky. But you will always be mine. And the stars might fall from the heavens, and night might cloak the earth, but until darkness dies, I will always be yours." ? Laura Thalassa, The Emperor of Evening Stars
